Community score: 3.5 The Haze quadruplets' backstory comes to light as the fight for the Hashirama Cell approaches its endgame in this week's Boruto: Naruto Next Generations. With their numbers decreased by half, the remaining quadruplets hatch a plan to keep the Leaf shinobi distracted just long enough for them to get the coveted cell over the border. While Asaka takes the cell and heads for the border, Hiruga stays behind and unleashes the Forbidden Jutsu: Hellish Obliteration, which immobilizes his pursuers and causes them to gradually sink into the underworld. However, as is the case with the other forbidden jutsu, there's a catch. As the one who performed the technique, Hiruga will be the first one to sink, at which point the jutsu will be released. Even though he'll be the only one to die, he deems this a worthy sacrifice, as it will buy his brother the time he needs. Having been a starving orphan, he doesn't want the same fate to befall any other children in the Land of Haze and believes the Hashirama Cell will bring long-term prosperity to the village. Unwilling to accept Boruto's sympathy and unmoved by his concern, Hiruga refuses to release the jutsu until an injured Omoi arrives on the scene and informs the group that Deepa (Victor's assassin) is hot on Asaka's trail. Wishing to protect his only remaining brother, Hiruga relents and sets off in pursuit of Deepa and Asaka. Although the quadruplets' backstory is fairly cookie-cutter, it provides the requisite level of motivation for their dogged pursuit of the Hashirama Cell. It's also nice to finally get a full account of the sacrifice Yoruga made at Sakuya's castle, the details of which had been a mystery for weeks. However, while the idea of enemies who are willing to make the ultimate sacrifice to achieve their goals is interesting, it's a bit strange that this bunch won't hesitate to employ the use of suicidal techniques. Since one of them has released a forbidden jutsu at every leg of this journey, it raises the question of how the brothers were able to survive previous missions. This tendency for self-sacrifice is likely meant to illustrate the importance of this particular mission, but kamikaze attacks seemingly being the only tools at their disposal has almost become comical at this point. With two quadruplets needlessly dead, it's fitting that Boruto is sympathetic to the brothers' plight and adamant about saving Hiruga's life, even at the cost of his own. Although the rest of the group is perfectly fine with running out the clock and letting Hiruga do himself in, Boruto recognizes how traumatic the Haze ninjas' childhood was and wants to end the chain of unnecessary sacrifice. The back-and-forth between Boruto and Hiruga also helps illustrate the disparity between the Land of Haze and prosperous nations like the Land of Fire, which has been one of the series' most common recurring themes. For an episode in which the main cast is largely immobilized, this week's installment is briskly-paced and provides important (albeit predictable) context for the actions of this arc's most prominent guest characters. With a third-party villain for the Haze and the Leaf to unite against, Boruto may yet leave a lasting impression on Hiruga and Asaka before curtain call. Even if he doesn't manage to get through to them, the forthcoming showdown with Deepa should provide quite the action spectacle. Synopsis The Konoha shinobi resume their pursuit, and worry about the lengths the Haze shinobi will go to complete their mission. As Deepa also resumes his pursuit, Omoi passes out trying to reach his team-mates. Asaka and Hiruga discuss their past, their brothers, and their debt to the Land of Haze for taking them in as orphans. Asaka notices the Konoha shinobi approaching, so they prepare for it. The Konoha shinobi strike first, but only hit clones, which obscure their sight upon destruction. They dodge explosive tag kunai, stepping on tar-like sludge on the ground. Hiruga appears, already activating another jutsu. The sludge restricts their movement, stopping them from forming hand seals. Asaka leaves with the Hashirama Cell. Everything in the range of the sludge begins to sink into it. Sarada notices that the closer things are to Hiruga, the faster they sink, and Mitsuki determines Hiruga will also perish. They question his willingness to sacrifice his life, but he retorts he's saving one. Hiruga thinks back about his brothers, and how Yoruga sacrificed his life so they could infiltrate Fushū Castle. Boruto questions the orders the quadruplets received, but Hiruga tells them how they were taken in, calling Boruto out for not knowing what it's like to starve, having lived in a great nation. Mugino determines that as Hiruga is the one sinking the fastest, if he dies, the jutsu will give out. They realise Hiruga is just buying time for Asaka to cross into the Land of Haze. Hiruga's jutsu begins to break, and Boruto tries saving him. Hiruga and Boruto both accuse the other of making assumptions about them. Omoi arrives, and informs them all of Deepa killing his subordinates, and they realise he will intersect with Asaka. Boruto convinces Hiruga to check on Asaka himself, so he releases the jutsu. Hiruga rushes to Asaka, with the Konoha shinobi right behind him. Omoi stays behind after warning Mugino and Konohamaru of Deepa's abilities. Deepa arrives at the border of the Land of Haze. Trivia In the official subtitles, there's a translation mistake. When Asaka and Hiruga discuss their past, the subtitles mistakenly have the Land of Silence as the place that took them in instead of the Land of Haze.
